ATHERTON'S JOB.

The gray twilight was falling when Atherton climbed the steps of a certain substantial-looking house on the avenue and rang the bell. Yes, the maid assured him, Miss Fenton was in. She would take his card to her at once.

Atherton went into the cozy reception room to wait. In a moment the portières were whisked aside and Margaret Fenton entered the room. She looked at Atherton coldly as he jumped to his feet.

"So, you've come at last," she said. Atherton smiled in enigmatic fashion. He seemed neither embarrassed nor apologetic. The girl was plainly irritated.

"My dear Margaret," said he, "I know I owe you a thousand apologies, but really I couldn't come last evening. The fact is, I had a business appointment."

"A business appointment?" she interrupted, incredulously.

"Exactly," said he. "And to-day I was detained at the office until after five o'clock."

"At the office?" she asked, with a puzzled frown.

"At the office," he repeated, smiling impudently. "You see, I have at last heeded your advice. The old careless life is behind me. I'm a toiler now—a bread winner, if you like."

"In what capacity, pray?" she inquired, the faintest bit of sarcasm showing at the corners of her mouth.

"I'm a humble clerk in an insurance office," he explained. "Worthily secured the position for me—'Job' he prefers to call it."

"Really, Ted?" she asked, dubiously.

"Really," he affirmed. "This my first day at it."

"Oh, I see," she said. "You didn't come for—for your answer last night until you were really doing something. Ted, I'm glad you're an idler no longer. I'm proud of you."

He smiled rather lugubriously.

"I must confess I prefer idling," he said.

"But you'll stick it out?" she asked.

"Oh, I shall stick it out, no fear," said he.

"Well, I'll forgive you for not coming last night," said she. "And since you are working—really doing something, however humble it is, the answer you want—"

"Pardon me," he interrupted her. "I can't have an answer. I have no right to one. You will very kindly forget Margaret that I have ever asked for one."

She looked at him with speechless astonishment. He was smiling gravely.

"Margaret," he said, quietly, "I put the old life behind me because I had to. The failure last Tuesday of Simpson & Co. has put my finances in a tottering condition. There will be something left, it is true, but little, very little. I am a clerk because I have to—because it means bread and butter to me."

She sat for a moment in stunned silence.

"Oh, Ted," she cried, at length. "I'm so sorry."

"I don't mind the loss of the money so much," said he, slowly; "and after all, I don't believe I'm so terribly afraid of work. But the part that hurts lies in the fact that I have lost you. Of course, dear, I know just what you are going to say—that you'll wait for me through eternity, if necessary. But that isn't wise. You must be free, absolutely free—so that when the other fellow comes along, who is just as good as I am and a little better, probably, you can listen to him with no disloyalty to me."

He tried to speak lightly, but there was a note of bitterness in his voice. He rose and stood a minute irresolute.

"Good-by," he said, shortly, and bolted for the door.

The girl rose quickly and barred the way. Her cheeks were flushed and her eyes shining.

"Ted," she said, "I'm ashamed of you—ashamed and disappointed."

He stood before her silent.

"I thought you cared enough for me to understand me," she said, with some heat.

"Cared!" he cried. "Good Lord, Margaret, can't you see what this means to me?"

"But you don't understand," she went on; "you're not even trying to. You look at this matter in your one-sided man fashion. You don't ask what it means to me—or what I want to do. You say to me: 'You are free,' and you seem to think that ends it."

Her eyes were shining suspiciously now. Atherton looked at her helplessly.

"It is now you need me, when you have everything to do," she said, "and yet you cast me aside as if I would be a drag."

"Good heavens, no, child!" he said, quickly. "Do you suppose I'd let you make such sacrifices for me? Do you suppose I'd let you live in all that poverty means—the narrowness, the obscurity of it—"

"Ted, what are narrowness and obscurity if I have you?" she asked. "I'm not afraid."

Atherton's hands were clenching and unclenching nervously.

"Don't tempt me," he said.

She smiled at him with a world of tenderness in her eyes.

"Would I be such a hindrance?" she asked.

"Child, I'd be a happy sewer digger—with you," he cried, and before he knew it he had caught her in his arms.

"And the funny part of it all is," said she, a few minutes later, "I had fully made up my mind that your answer was to be 'no.'"—Kansas City Star.

Suspicious.

Out in California a member of the state legislature has framed a law which, if adopted, will make it necessary for a man and a woman to swear when they apply for a marriage license that they are not crazy. It is suspected that the author of the bill has been twining to support a $5,000-a-year wife on a salary of $60 a month.

CAVE OF SWALLOWS

A FAIRY BIRD PALACE IN THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

One of the Strange Sights Travelers to Samoa May See If They Are Fortunate—Thousands of Feathered Tenants.

Apia, Samoa.—Lying in the heart of the Pacific, just south of the equator, are green and lovely islands ruled over by the great dominions of the earth, America, England, Germany and France, all have their fingers in the pie, and many a juicy plum has rewarded their efforts.

Small crafts of all kinds ply between the islands, trading vessels, freight schooners and the busy little steamers that carry a limited number of passengers, indiscriminately mixed shipments of dry goods, livestock, etc.

The trip through these waters, and touching at the various ports, is one of great interest and most entertaining. Embarking perhaps at Apia, the principal town of Samoa, you travel toward the south. The boats are not the floating palaces of larger travel, but are, on the whole, fairly comfortable, able little crafts, and plow steadily through the waters in a most satisfactory way.

As the various islands of neighboring groups are reached the little vessel makes port and lies at the wharf or at anchor in the harbor, while countless small craft swarm about, filled with traders or natives anxious to earn a shilling.

After passing one of the large islands in the Tongan group you will see a small densely wooded isle a little to the eastward. Immediately upon sighting this, those of the passengers who have made the trip before will begin besieging the captain to slow down. If he is in an amiable frame of mind, if the weather be propitious; in fact if he is approached in just the right manner, probably the boat will come to a stop and either the small boats lowered or native canoes will come hurrying out from shore.

Here, in the far away Pacific, is enacted a scene almost identical to that on the popular Italian coast—there hundreds of tourists visit the "blue grotto," a cave set in the rocks in almost the same surroundings as this fairy cave of the tropics.

As the boat loads of sightseers approach the cave it is seen to be a small opening almost completely shadowed by overhanging greenery. Only at low tide can the entrance be made, then the boatman, standing on the prow of his boat, approaches to within about ten feet of the entrance. Producing a large revolver, he aims for the center of the opening and fires.

Instantly there is an almost deafening noise, as of thousands of whistles blowing, and out of the cave swarm clouds of swallows; the air is full of them, the very heavens grow dark. As the cloud of birds lifts the boats are propelled swiftly forward and, waving torches over their heads, the boatmen conduct their charges into this odd resting place. The walls, lighted by the flickering flame, present a most delightful spectacle. Covered with the deposits of countless years, it looks almost like a crystal palace. The echo is tremendous and the lap of the water makes a continuous dull roar.

As you emerge into the open day you hear the screams and cries of the birds, frightened at the thoughts of possible marauders, and as the torches are lowered and the boats withdraw, the very sea seems to give up these fluttering, anxious things, and they swarm into their own again.

It is a strange sight and one well worth going many a mile to see.

The Colonel's Waterloo.

Colonel John M. Fuller, of Honey Grove, Texas, nearly met his Waterloo, from Liver and Kidney trouble. In a recent letter, he says: "I was nearly dead, of these complaints, and, although I tried my family doctor, he did me no good; so I got a 50c bottle of your great Elixir Bitters, which cured me. In consideration the best medicine on earth, and thank God who gave you the knowledge to make them." "Sold and guaranteed to cure, Dyspepsia, Biliousness and Kidney Disease, by R. C. Hardwick druggist, at 50c a bottle."
